Seoul

A closer look at the city

The shape of Seoul

South Korea’s capital

The Han River separates the city’s northern and southern districts. Mountains frame the skyline.

Gyeongbokgung

1395

The year Joseon’s main palace opened

Stone courtyards and painted eaves, with mountains behind the roofs.

Seongsu’s café scene

Coffee in a former warehouse

Seongsu’s cafés often occupy old industrial buildings.

Steel beams and exposed brick give the rooms their character.

Gwangjang Market

A few market staples

Bindaetteok

Mung bean pancakes

Gimbap

Rice wrapped in seaweed

Tteokbokki

Rice cakes in a spicy sauce

By the Han River

Walking paths and cycle routes follow the water through Seoul’s riverside parks.

Yeouido and Ttukseom are two places to spend an afternoon by the river.

An evening in Euljiro

Tool shops and printing houses share the alleys with cafés and bars.

The neighborhood changes as the signs light up.